California wildfire victims sue utility PG&E alleging negligence

(Reuters) - Victims of California's deadliest wildfire have filed a lawsuit against PG&E Corp alleging negligence and health and safety code violations by the utility company in the blaze that has killed at least 48 people. The lawsuit seeking damages against California's largest public utility was filed on Tuesday in San Francisco County Superior Court by three law firms, which refer to themselves as Northern California Fire Lawyers. PG&E shares and bonds plunge as California wildfire risks mount

PG&E shares and bonds plunge as California wildfire risks mount "It's important to remember that the cause (of the "Camp Fire") has yet to be determined," PG&E said in a statement. "Right now, our primary focus is on the communities, supporting first responders and getting our crews positioned and ready to respond when we get access, so that we can safely restore gas and electricity to our customers."

The Camp Fire, which began last Thursday, has all but wiped out the Sierra foothills town of Paradise in Butte County, about 175 miles (280 km) north of San Francisco, that was overrun by flames and largely incinerated.

But both PG&E and Southern California Edison have reported to regulators that they experienced problems with transmission lines or substations in areas around the time the blazes were first reported.

The lawsuit alleged that PG&E failed to properly maintain, repair and replace its equipment and that "its inexcusable behavior contributed to the cause of the 'Camp Fire.'"

The lawsuit alleges that prior to the Camp Fire, PG&E began warning customers it might turn off power because of the high risk of wildfires. "Despite its own recognition of these impending hazardous conditions, on the day of the Camp Fire's ignition, PG&E ultimately made the decision not to proceed with its plans for a power shutoff," the lawsuit stated.

Last month PG&E cut off electric power to about 60,000 customers to prevent wildfires as high winds threatened to topple trees and power lines. Searchers looking for the remains of victims in the charred ruins of Paradise were set to expand their operation on Wednesday as firefighters stepped up efforts to contain the blaze.

The origins of the "Camp Fire" and the "Woolsey Fire" that has ravaged parts of southern California are still under investigation. Butte County District Attorney Mike Ramsey told KRCR television on Wednesday that attributing the fire to PG&E at this point was "speculative."

But he added that officials from the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection (Cal Fire) arrived in the area immediately after the fire began to ensure that any equipment or other evidence would be preserved for an investigation. PG&E stock slid 21.8 percent to close at $25.59. PG&E's bonds have weakened broadly after the California electric utility said late Tuesday it had borrowed more than $3 billion from its credit facilities. It also warned it might face liabilities stemming from the Camp Fire that could exceed its insurance coverage.

Florida law mandates recounts in elections where the margin of victory is less than 0.5 percent. The result of Arizona's closely fought U.S. Senate race emerged on Monday night when U.S. Representative Kyrsten Sinema declared victory and Republican opponent Martha McSally conceded, after multiple media outlets called the closely contested Arizona race for the Democrat.

Sinema will succeed Republican Senator Jeff Flake, a frequent Trump critic, who did not seek reelection.

Houston society turns out to raise funds for good causes

Houston society turned out in droves earlier this month to raise funds for a number of good causes.

On Thursday, Nov. 8, Buffalo Bayou Park's annual gala dinner raised $600,000 for future projects. Some 550 guests entered the soiree via the Water Works before venturing underground to tour Carlos Cruz-Diez's art installation inside the Buffalo Bayou Cistern. The "casually A-list throng" including Lynn Wyatt, Susie Criner, Sorarya McClelland, Cathy and Jo Cleary, and Anne Whitlock and Michael Skelly happily dug into their beef tenderloin and vanilla panna cotta.

Then the no frills biannual Constellation Gala raised an astronomical $10.1 million for the University of Texas Health Science Center. No speeches, no gowns, no problem.

More than 550 supporters arrived at the Marriott Marquis Houston in cocktail attire; a few even self-parked their vehicles in an adjacent George R. Brown Convention Center garage and entered the party via a same-level Sky Bridge. Aerialists and dancers from Elan Artists hung and spun from six elevated platforms surrounding the central stage.

Monday night, Nov. 5, sports fans and local foodies sampled dishes from 25 Houston-area restaurants for Taste of the Texans, which raised $350,000 for Houston Food Bank, Houston Methodist and Houston Texans Foundation.

NRG Stadium transformed into a food hall of sorts. More than 750 event-goers and members of the Texans rookie class feted the Verizon West Club for the annual eat-a-thon.

Earlier in the month, the annual "Body as a Work of Art" gala raised an undisclosed amount for community-focused programming at the John P. McGovern Museum of Health and Medical Science.

Klein-area nurse arrested for injecting fillers without a license

Patients go to Savvy Chic Medspa to look better, but the recent arrest of a nurse might make the clinic look less than its best.

Michelle Bogle, 43, was arrested on Thursday and charged with practicing medicine without a license, which is a third degree offense.

According to court documents, an undercover officer with the Houston Police Department arrived at the clinic to obtain a consultation with a medical doctor and Bogle.

After a video consultation, Bogle then gave the officer a filler treatment recommendations such as Botox and signed her name as a "practitioner" on record.

Bogle, who is also the owner of the spa, was not a licensed physician, licensed physician's assistant or advanced practice registered nurse and therefore "not authorized to diagnosis or recommend treatment of nonsurgical medical cosmetic procedures such as Juvederm injections," according to court documents.

The Texas Administrative Code states physicians or midlevel practitioners must be trained in nonsurgical procedures, including injectable fillers.

The Texas Board of Nursing has Bogle listed as a licensed vocational nurse.

The board defines licensed vocational nursing as a "directed scope of practice and requires appropriate supervision of a registered nurse, advanced practice registered nurse, physician assistant, physician, dentist, or podiatrist."

According to county records, Bogle met her $2,500 bail and is expected to be back in court in January.

In 1895, in his early 20s, Wong Kim Ark returned to the United States, the place of his birth.

He'd grown up in San Francisco, the son of Chinese immigrants, and was a cook by trade. His parents had returned to their own homeland in 1890, and he'd gone with them — but in the time since he'd established a transnational lifestyle.

He'd started a family in China, but repeatedly made trips back to the US to work. In fact, he'd just met his first child, conceived on an earlier trip, and gotten his wife pregnant with a second.

Such arrangements were not uncommon for Chinese-American men, as the Chinese population in the US was overwhelmingly male.

The US was in the grips of intense anti-Chinese sentiment, and Chinese immigration had been cut off in 1882. But since he'd been born in the US, he was able to return by showing the documents required by local customs officials, including testimony from white people that he was a US citizen.

Or at least that's how it had worked for him before. In 1895, it was different.

San Francisco, California, circa 1895.

Wong was denied entry by a stridently anti-Chinese customs collector, on the grounds that he was not in fact a US citizen, owing to his parents' status as Chinese immigrants at the time of his birth. Then he was held on ships for months as he fought the case — with legal help from the "Six Companies," a Chinese-American organization that had made a point of standing up for Chinese civil rights in thousands of court cases.

Eventually it was decided, on the basis of an earlier appeals-court precedent, that his US birth made him a citizen. But the US attorney general decided to push the issue further, and his case ended up at the Supreme Court.

That court's ultimate decision is back in the spotlight now. In an interview released early this week, President Trump announced a plan to take on "birthright citizenship" via executive order.

This is the rule under which just about everyone born in the USA — including the children of illegal immigrants — is automatically granted citizenship, and the rule that Wong helped make US law.

It's important to understand the situation Wong was born into. Between 1860 and 1880, the Chinese-American population tripled, topping 100,000 by the end of that period and concentrated largely in California. In 1868 a treaty explicitly welcomed these migrants — though they were not eligible for naturalization. And while Chinese-Americans made up small percentage of the overall American population, the tide shifted after repeated economic recessions, fueling a racist backlash.

President Trump announced a plan to take on "birthright citizenship" via executive order.

In theory, Wong's case posed a rather narrow question: Whether he was covered by the 14th Amendment clause granting citizenship to "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof."

Today, most courts would carefully parse those words, check dictionaries as needed, consult legal texts to see if the phrase was a term of art, and perhaps read up on the legislative history as well, to see what the people who actually wrote the words intended to convey.

Back then, however, the Supreme Court took a different path. In a 6-2 ruling, it touched on the text and history of the actual amendment only lightly and decided to cement the definition of citizenship we'd inherited from English common law, where everyone born in the country is treated as a natural subject. The same rule had applied to whites in the US since the country's founding, the Court said, and the amendment had extended the rule to everyone else.

This is how Wong got his citizenship. And it's why birthright citizenship presents such an enormous hurdle for those that oppose it.

Opponents of birthright citizenship today aren't trying to prevent legal immigrants from re-entering the country if they visit their homelands, though, or to exclude entire racial groups.

Rather, they primarily fear — quite sensibly — that immediately granting citizenship to the children of people who came here illegally serves as a magnet, or at least a reward, for crossing our borders without authorization.

'Birthright' Babies Outnumber Births in 16 States.

Today's Supreme Court could certainly reconsider the issue and consult a wealth of evidence that the 1898 Court mostly ignored, including the debates surrounding the 14th Amendment. But there is strong evidence from those debates that the amendment was, in fact, meant to confer citizenship on virtually everyone born here, with just a handful of exceptions (such as the kids of foreign ambassadors). There are respected legal scholars who disagree — advancing a theory that "jurisdiction" requires allegiance to and the consent of the US — but a challenge to birthright citizenship would require all five conservative justices to read the historical evidence in a very specific way and break with decades upon decades' worth of precedent and standard practice.

Wong Kim Ark eventually returned to China for good. His legacy will remain a part of America for far, far longer. (Courtesy newyorkpost.com)

CDC Confirms More Cases Of Rare, Paralyzing Illness AFM In Kids

Compiled And Edited By John T. Robbins, Southern Daily Editor

A total of 90 people in 27 states have come down with the rare, polio-like neurological condition acute flaccid myelitis, also known as AFM, so far this year, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported Tuesday. That's up from 72 cases reported last week. The CDC is investigating an additional 162 cases for potential AFM.

Almost all of the patients are children under the age of 18. Officials still do not know what causes the illness and what is behind the recent spike in cases.

AFM is an illness that affects the nervous system, specifically the area of spinal cord called gray matter. It causes the muscles and reflexes in the body to become weak or even paralyzed. Cases of AFM are characterized by a sudden onset of arm or leg weakness and loss of muscle tone and reflexes. In extreme cases, patients may need a ventilator to breathe.

Its symptoms are likened to those caused by polio, which was eradicated in the U.S. thanks to the polio vaccine. However, the CDC has stressed that none of the children who developed these symptoms had the polio virus.

Health officials saw the first wave of AFM cases in 2014, when 120 cases were confirmed in the United States. Another 149 were reported in 2016. Case counts were far lower in 2015 and 2017, and experts don't know why it seems to follow an every-other-year pattern. In years where more cases have been reported, peaks are seen in the late summer and fall.

The CDC knows of one death in a child who had AFM in 2017. No deaths from the illness have been reported in 2018.

Questions also remain over what causes the illness itself. In 2014, the first wave of the mystery disease coincided with an outbreak of a specific type of virus, an enterovirus called EV-D68, leading the CDC to study a possible connection between the two.

However, this year officials have tested for EV-D68 in about three-quarters of the confirmed AFM cases and detected it in the spinal fluid of just one patient. Another type of enterovirus called EV-A71 was found in another patient.

Dr. Nancy Messonnier, director of the National Center for Immunization and Respiratory Diseases at the CDC, told reporters during a press briefing Tuesday that the CDC has created a task force of specialists to better understand AFM. She said the CDC is "broadening our hypotheses" for what may cause AFM.

For example, if the illness is caused by a virus, Messonnier said, it is possible that the currently available tests are unable to pick it up, or perhaps the germ has already cleared the spinal fluid by the time the testing was conducted, or that it is hidden elsewhere in the body.

Another theory is that there's something in certain individuals that predisposes their immune system to react so severely that it triggers paralysis.

All things considered, AFM is extremely rare, with the CDC estimating that less than one in a million people in the United States will get AFM every year.

"As a mom myself I can certainly understand why parents are worried," Messonnier said. "But it's important for parents to realize it still is a relatively rare condition."

She says parents who are concerned about

AFM or think their child has symptoms of the illness should speak to their pediatrician.

Georgia toddler paralyzed overnight as AFM fears grow nationwide

ATLANTA - A Georgia mother said her toddler went to bed sick and woke up paralyzed from the neck down.

It's the latest in a series of mysterious illnesses that are baffling doctors. Two young patients were recently treated at Scottish Rite after they fell ill and then woke up partially paralyzed.

Doctors are still working to figure out what causes acute flaccid myelitis, or AFM, but they tell Channel 2 Action News the rare condition is similar to polio, in that it can cause muscle weakness or partial paralysis.

And like polio, doctors believe AFM is caused by a virus, but they don't know which virus.

That was the case for a 2-year-old Abigail. Her mother said one moment she was a healthy child who came down with a double ear infection and fever. Then a few days later, she woke up paralyzed from the neck down.

Doctors diagnosed Abigail with AFM. She's now in rehab making great progress. "It's a rare occurrence its one in a million, in a million," said Dr. Anthony Fauci, National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases Director.

Across the country, the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reports 62 confirmed cases of AFM in 22 states, and 93 possible cases.

"It's really heartbreaking. No parent should ever have to experience that and what makes it worse, it's not the tubes, it's not the treatments, what makes it worse is not knowing what caused it," said Abigail's mother, Erica Palacios.

There were 5 cases reported in Georgia in 2016.

Doctors said the West Nile Virus may be the cause in some of the cases.

"It's a very frustrating situation we do not know definitively what it is, although there is a suspicion, a strong suspicion that it is associated with a particular type of virus that we recognize," Fauci said.

What CDC Doesn't Know

Among the people who were diagnosed with AFM since August 2014:

The cause of most of the AFM cases remains unknown.

We don't know what caused the increase in AFM cases starting in 2014.

We have not yet determined who is at higher risk for developing AFM, or the reasons why they may be at higher risk.

We do not yet know the long-term effects of AFM. We know that some patients diagnosed with AFM have recovered quickly, and some continue to have paralysis and require ongoing care.

What CDC Is Doing

CDC is actively investigating AFM cases and monitoring disease activity. We are working closely with healthcare providers and state and local health departments to increase awareness for AFM. We are encouraging healthcare providers to recognize and report suspected cases of AFM to their health departments, and for health departments to send this information to CDC to help us understand the nationwide burden of AFM. CDC is also actively looking for risk factors and possible causes of this condition.

CDC Activities Include:

Urging healthcare providers to be vigilant for AFM among their patients, and to send information about suspected cases to their health departments

Verifying clinical information of suspected AFM cases submitted by health departments, and working with health departments and neurologists to classify cases using a case definition adopted by the Council of State and Territorial Epidemiologists (CSTE)

Testing specimens, including stool, blood, and cerebrospinal fluid, from suspected AFM cases

Working with healthcare providers, experts, and state and local health departments to investigate and better understand the AFM cases, including potential causes and how often the condition occurs

Providing new and updated information to healthcare providers, health departments, policymakers, the public, and partners in various formats, such as scientific journals and meetings, and CDC's AFM website and social media

Using multiple research methods to further explore the potential association of AFM with possible causes as well as risk factors for AFM. This includes collaborating with experts to review MRI scans of people from the past 10 years to determine how many AFM cases occurred before 2014, updating treatment and management protocols, and engaging with several academic centers to conduct active surveillance simultaneously for both AFM and respiratory viruses.
